ICPSR Summer Program Workshop in Longitudinal Analysis of Historical Demographic Data

-July 20–August 14, 2009 in Ann Arbor, Michigan*

Historical demography is an interdisciplinary field with a long history of important contributions to population studies and to the understanding of the past. This research has revealed a great deal about fundamental demographic processes such as household and family dynamics, the transition to smaller family units, pre- and post-industrial population dynamics, the demographic transition, migration patterns, and demographic responses to economic stress. This 4-week course will emphasize the use of event history analysis and data management of historical databases drawn from European, North American, and Asian populations. Longitudinal data will be employed to construct time-varying covariates and contextual variables for individuals, families, and households. Methodological issues such as censoring and incomplete information will also be addressed. Read more information about the course at www.icpsr.umich.edu/sumprog/historical-demography.html.

-Application deadline: May 4, 2009

Applications are competitive. Participants will be selected on the basis of their interest in the topical areas, prior methodological training, and potential for research contributions that promote longitudinal analysis. Participants should be familiar with quantitative methods, including regression analysis. Those who need preparation in statistics are advised to attend quantitative courses during the June–July session of the ICPSR Summer Program. A limited number of stipends (between $500 and $2,000 US) will be awarded to cover travel and other expenses. For those admitted to the workshop, no fee will be charged to attend the Longitudinal Analysis in Historical Demography course. Apply on-line at www.icpsr.umich.edu/training/summer/, or at the ICPSR booth at the PAA meetings in Detroit. Support provided by the National Institutes of Health* and the ICPSR Summer Program.

*Pending final funding approval from the National Institutes of Health

Senior Fraud Alert: "Urgent! We Are Now Servicing Your Mortgage."

Wednesday, February 18, 2009

Former Task Force Co-Chair Art Englehardt, now working with the Cornelius Police Department, wishes to share the following with fellow Task Force members:

An older consumer in the Cornelius community received a text message on her phone. It was from a company she had never heard from before. The message indicated that the company was now servicing her mortgage account and that she needed to provide sensitive checking account information (including her PIN) right away so that automatic mortgage payments could be switched over without a monthly payment being missed. She did not respond to the message. Her mortgage had not been assigned to another company.
