Parliamentary Documents

Membership directories and Reports are the two types of parliamentary documents which provide comprehensive sets of information about the members and activities of any one term of office of the parliament of any one country.

We emphasize the collection of these basic working documents for the parliaments of post-communist parliaments. This collection is a basic source of evidence about the beginning stages of the development of new democratic parliaments. While many other publications are issued by, and about, parliaments, they are diverse in content and format within any one country, and are very different among countries.

The two types of basic and working parliamentary documents are fairly small in size, and thus are easily stored. They are also, however, diverse in size and format and thus are difficult to collect systematically. No other library in the world (to our knowledge) collects these types of materials for a variety of countries. While each may be available in special collections in any one country, they are not collected or archived in any one location for several or more parliaments over a period of time.

Membership directories usually list the names of members of a parliament, with identification of district and party. They may also provide pictures of the members and a brief biographical sketch of each. In addition, they often list the members by party and show the distribution of members among the committees and special working bodies of the parliament. Finally, some directories provide basic statistics of the members, such as age, gender and previous terms of parliamentary service. The membership directories thus provide essential information about the members for each term of office.

In most parliaments, the membership directory is issued at the beginning of a parliamentary term. In new and sometimes unstable parliaments, there is a considerable turnover of members within the term, but the directory at least indicates the membership at the beginning of each term. But in some instances, the directories are not issued until the middle of the term, in some cases to provide current mid-term information. In some parliaments, the directories are issued by private sources, either commercial or non-profit. While we emphasize official publications, we include privately issued ones if they are the only ones available. We are usually told, in those cases, that the private publications are the ones used at the parliaments, which increases our confidence in their accuracy and relevance.

Reports of parliamentary activity are much more diverse than the membership directories. In Poland and Hungary, for example, thick reports are issued every year, and are cumulative through the (typical) four years of a parliamentary term. At the other extreme, some parliaments issue no reports of their activities. As an intermediate type of report, the Czech Chamber of Deputies issues a list of the titles of bills adopted by the parliament.

Search for these two types of documents, is both simplified and complicated by computerization. Most parliaments now have their own websites, which usually list basic information about the members. While websites tend to be current, they typically do not provide access to past membership information. Parliamentary websites vary greatly in their contents, in the frequency of revision, and in the ease of access in world languages in addition to the state language(s).

Report information is increasingly provided on the parliament's internal computer system, which differs from information on the publicly accessible website. We are sometimes provided report information on disk, with files transferred directly from internal sources. The material in these files is often not produced in publication form. Because of changing technology in parliaments, our own collection keeps changing; we now collect and archive computer disks as well as paper-based publications.

We provide a catalogue of document titles and call numbers. The titles are given in the state language, with English translations. Some publications, however, are issued in English as well as in the state language.

Documents are mainly stored in a book case, for they approximate the size of booklets and have a firm binding as well as standard publication source information. More fragile materials are stored in a file cabinet.

Each publication carries a discrete call number. Since no library (to our knowledge) retains or catalogues these types of parliamentary documents on a multi-national basis, the call number system is unique to this collection. As the number and diversity of parliamentary data sources proliferate, the call number system will necessarily adapt.

Our collection includes two other types of parliamentary documents: rules of procedure, and constitutions. Rules of procedure (“Standing Orders” in Westminster parliaments) in post-communist parliaments were inherited from Communist predecessors, necessitating major changes. As each parliament rewrites its internal structure and procedures, we attempt to obtain a copy of the new rules.

While constitutions are available from several sources, the constitution is a basic document for the understanding of parliaments. In addition, many parliaments enact “constitutional laws,” which elaborate general provisions in the basic document, and which are regarded as part of a country’s constitution. Sometimes, rules of procedure have this status, as often do election laws.

Both the Rules and Constitutions, and constitutional laws, are collected in the text of the state language. They are sometimes translated into English (or German) by either parliamentary or private sources. Unlike the directories and reports, the rules and constitutions are issued episodically rather than periodically. Both types of publications are included in the Parliamentary Documents Catalogue.

In addition to the four types of parliamentary documents in our “core” collection, a wide variety of other publications are issued by and about parliaments. We retain these “ancillary” as we discover them, but have no titles listing in a catalogue. In addition, we retain membership directories and reports from other parliaments as they become available to us, but neither are they catalogued. Each type of ancillary document is stored either on a set of book shelves or in file cabinets.

We have, in addition, a large varied assortment of materials about parliamentary elections in post-communist democracies, as a necessary supplement to our main concern with parliaments. These materials are contained in country folders in file cabinets.
