Dear UNCG Community:

The University of North Carolina at Greensboro is committed to adhering to all export control laws and regulations. Compliance with these regulations is paramount to the safety and national security of the United States of America. Export control regulations affect a broad spectrum of university functions including admissions, human resources, international programs, academic research, sponsored programs, technology transfer, accounts payable, and materials management and procurement. In particular, taking laptop computers out of the country can be subject to export control regulations.

The Office of Research and Public/Private Sector Partnerships is developing Guidelines and Procedures for the Management of Export Controls. It is important to note that exemptions from the regulations exist for published course work (that which is announced in our course catalogues or training, symposium, seminar offerings) and for "fundamental research" (defined as basic and applied research conducted by an accredited U.S. institution of higher education where no publication restrictions or other offending language exists). It is critical that every member of the UNCG community be aware of the export control regulations so that we can work together to preserve these exemptions and prevent any violations from occurring. The penalties for export control violations are both civil and criminal in nature and under certain circumstances may be applied to you personally as well as the institution. These penalties include federal prison time of up to 20 years and fines reaching as high as $1,000,000 per violation.

If you have any questions or concerns regarding UNCG's policies and practices on export control compliance or your particular circumstances with respect to export controls, please contact Dr. Rosemary Wander, Associate Provost for Research and Public/Private Sector Partnerships by e-mail at rwander@uncg.edu by phone at 334-4623.

Sincerely,

Linda P. Brady
Chancellor
